Georgia’s History:

Reconstruction
Reconstruction means to build something again.

It is the name given to the time period after the Civil War, from 1865 to 1877.

Georgia and the other southern states needed to be rebuilt and brought back into the Union.

President Lincoln’s plan for rebuilding the South had three parts:

• First, one-tenth of the people in the state had to take an oath to obey the U.S. Constitution.

• Second, the state had to set up a new government.

• Third, they had to abolish slavery.
• While Lincoln wanted to be fair to the South, many Radical Republicans felt that Lincoln’s plan was too lenient.

• They felt that Southern states should be punished for their actions during the Civil War.
After Lincoln’s assassination, Andrew Johnson took over the presidency and committed to carrying out Lincoln’s Reconstruction plan.

In December 1865, ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution freed all slaves in the United States. It banned slavery in the US and any of its territories.

President Johnson said that once the amendment passed, Southern states could come back into the Union.
13th Amendment

It was approved by Abraham Lincoln in February, but was not ratified until December.
In 1868, the Fourteenth Amendment made all former slaves citizens of the United States.

It granted citizenship to all persons born in the United States, and it guaranteed all citizens equal rights under the law.

At first, Tennessee was the only Southern state to approve it, but Congress told the states they must approve it to be readmitted to the Union.
14th Amendment (Original)
• In 1870, the Fifteenth Amendment declared that no citizen of the United States could be denied the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous servitude.

• It granted the right to vote to all male citizens.

• African Americans could now vote and run for office.

Freedmen’s Bureau

- In March 1865, the federal government set up the Freedmen’s Bureau, an organization that helped feed, clothe, and provide medical care to former slaves.
- It also established thousands of schools and helped African Americans with legal problems.
- The bureau also helped poor whites, many of whom lost everything in the war.

• Georgia had a higher population of freed black slaves (who were uneducated and unemployed) than any other state.
• Educating slaves was forbidden in Georgia prior to the Civil War.
• The Freedmen’s Bureau created the first public school program for blacks and whites in the state and set the stage for Georgia’s modern public school system.
• It established Clarke Atlanta University and Morehouse College.
Many former slaves were forced to return to plantations because they could not find work.

Freed slaves knew how to grow crops, and landowners still needed labor.

In the sharecropping arrangement, the owner would lend the worker a place to live, his seeds, and farm equipment.

Sharecropping

• Sharecroppers received almost no pay, just a small share of the crops.

• Because the worker had no money for rent, he would give the owner a share of the crop, plus extra for the cost of rent and supplies.

• The workers had little hope of ever owning land because they rarely made a profit.

Tenant farmers made similar arrangements with landowners where they rented sections of land.

However, unlike sharecroppers, tenant farmers often owned animals, equipment, and supplies, so they received more of the harvest.

Even so, after money was deducted for rent, there was little left over for the farmer.

It was impossible to get ahead as a sharecropper or tenant farmer.
For a brief period during Reconstruction, Freedmen were given more political rights than they had ever had (and would not have again for 100 years).

With this freedom, 32 black legislators were elected to the Georgia General Assembly in 1867.

Among the delegates was Henry McNeal Turner, an educated minister who had served as the first black chaplain in the U.S. Army.

[^120]: According to the given data, African Americans served in various capacities in the U.S. Congress during the years 1870–1876, with the highest numbers in states like South Carolina and Mississippi. The table provides a comprehensive overview of their representation, highlighting both state legislatures and national offices.
Henry McNeal Turner was born in 1834 to a family that had been free for at least two generations.

At the age of 15, he went to work for a law firm in South Carolina where his employers provided him with an education.

In 1853, he received his preaching license and traveled throughout the South.

In 1867, Turner helped organize the Republican Party in the state and was elected to the Constitutional Convention of 1867 and the Georgia House of Representatives.

In 1868, the Georgia legislature expelled its black legislators, saying that the Georgia Constitution denied blacks the right to hold political office.

Turner spoke out against the policy and soon after, he began receiving threats from the Ku Klux Klan.

Other black legislators were threatened by the KKK—over 25% were killed, beaten, or jailed during their term.
The first Ku Klux Klan (KKK) began in 1867 as a social club for former confederate soldiers; however, they became more political and violent.

The Ku Klux Klan used violence to frighten African-Americans and keep them from exercising their civil rights.

Klansmen dressed up in white sheets and hooded masks, and would terrorize blacks (and whites who tried to help them).
The KKK used tactics of intimidation, physical violence, and murder in hopes of establishing social control over African Americans and their white allies.

The KKK grew in Georgia and the southern United States both during and after Reconstruction.

White supremacy and racial segregation became the norm in Georgia, and the rest of the South, for several decades.
